

Workshop “Political and Social Dynamics of Crisis and Innovation in Japan, Asia and the World”

Discussion published by Sebastian Maslow on Saturday, January 13, 2018

Dear List Members

We are pleased to invite you to attend the workshop on “Political and Social Dynamics of Crisis and Innovation in Japan, Asia and the World” hosted by the Tohoku Forum for Creativity at Tohoku University on February 9, 2018. The workshop is preceded by a roundtable discussion on February 8 on the theme of “Japan as ‘Number Three?’: Revisiting Academic and Public Discourses on Japan’s ‘Lost Decades’”. We look forward to welcoming you in Sendai.

Project Overview

While East Asian developing countries’ economic growth has become a major driving force of global change, many advanced countries struggle to readjust their social, economic and political institutions to the challenges imposed by financial crises, shrinking populations, and global power shifts. As an economically and technologically advanced society, Japan finds itself at the intersection of these East Asian and global developments. Thus, understanding Japan’s policy choices is critical for understanding the future of East Asia and the world. As Japan seeks to define its role and responsibilities in global affairs, two decades of low economic growth, rapid demographic change, and the implications of the 11 March 2011 triple disaster have generated a sense of national decline. This project revisits these notions of decline and demonstrates how the pertaining discourses of crisis have been a crucial force for innovation and the reform of public policy institutions. To show how fears of national decline in the past and the present shape - and are shaped - by social and political transformations, this project brings together scholars of political science, economics, sociology, media and cultural studies, and history.
