Dear Readers,

the first number of USAbroad - Journal of American History and Politics explores the peculiar never-ending process of social and political evolution of the United States held in the term "unfinished". The essays included in this number engage with the concept of "America Unfinished" and explore on the one side the ability of the United States to reinvent itself in times of crisis, driven by a traditional optimism in a better future; on the other side they critically approach its shadows, exploring issues such as racial discrimination and race relations, the controversial aspects of its foreign policy and the debate on the role of the United States in the post 9/11 global scenario.
