Teaching Opportunity

Discussion published by Lisa M. Brady on Wednesday, December 8, 2021

Boise State University (Idaho) seeks an adjunct instructor for our upper-division course on American urban history (see course description below). The course can be offered either remotely (synchronous via Zoom), online (asynchronous through Canvas), or in person if the candidate lives in the Treasure Valley. The course will be offered in fall semester 2022 (it can be offered as a five, seven, or fifteen week course). Ideal candidates will have experience teaching a similar course. The class is capped at 30 students and attracts History and Urban Studies majors primarily, but also may include students from other disciplines

HIST353 The Making of the Modern American City (3 credits). Explores the origins and evolution of the American city by examining the role of urban areas in the country’s economic, cultural, political, and environmental history from 1860 to the present. PREREQ: upper-division standing.

Interested scholars should contact Dr. Lisa M. Brady, History Department Chair, at lisabrady@boisestate.edu. We would like to make the appointment in early January, 2022, if possible.